I have lived near Almonte, Ontario since 1984. I took up photography seriously in 1995 after the Québec Referendum when I became fearful of losing this wonderful country.

Since that time I have photographed remote corners of Canada to remind us all what a magnificent country we have and why it's worth keeping it together. Photographing Canada has been a wonderful experience. Through my career as an engineer for Parks Canada and the pursuit of my personal photographic mission I have developed an understanding of how this vast country, with its rugged landscape and harsh climate, has shaped us as a people and instilled in us the values and the principles we stand for.
